Alexandria Gazette.

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 13, 1882.

The Past Summer in the Southern Hemisphere.
Recent reports from Australia represent the summer of 1882 in the Southern Hemisphere as having been exceptionally hot and droughty. A communication in Nature from a South Australian correspondent states that up to February 2 the season had been "most unusually dry" in the southern districts; water had to be carried by rail to some places, and "in the far north the new settlements are in fearful straits for water." On January 17, in the Sturt River region, "the thermometer was registered at 180 degrees in the sun and 114 degrees in the shade"—a heat which even indoors made metals unpleasantly hot to the hand and withered vegetation. According to temperature maxima furnished by this correspondent the hottest days felt in South Australia since 1850 occurred on the 17th and 19th of January last.

In a carefully compiled paper by the English climatologist, Mr. G. J. Symonds, it appears that up to 1877 the highest shade temperature ever observed at Melbourne was 111.2 degrees, and at Adelaide, South Australia, 113.5 degrees; so that the data given in Nature which have been corroborated by other reports of the late Australian summer, seem conclusive evidence of unusual solar radiation in that period. This may also, perhaps, account, for the late memorably mild winter and spring generally observed in the Northern Hemisphere.

The natural sequel of an extraordinary hot summer south of the Equator (during which the amount of water vapor evaporated from the oceanic hemisphere must of course be in excess of the normal amount) will obviously be the forcing of an unusual amount of the vapor-laden southern atmosphere into regions north of the Equator. This effect of a hot austral season would be to supply the aqueous material for abundant rainfall in the latter regions during their coming summer. Whether this will be the actual result will depend entirely on whether the forces of condensation in the "reel waves" which reach the northern continents from their Arctic coasts are sufficiently numerous and large to condense the surplus water vapor in their skies. But the facts reported from the far off regions of the Great Southern Ocean will be of marked interest to enlightened meteorologists and afford them some clue to the character of our own approaching summer.—N. Y. Herald.
